THE SOCIAL WORLD

The Wheel is Now the Social Factor of the Day.

BABY MARIAN AND HER MOTHER

Gossip of People of Whom Every One Has Heard.

SOME OF THE FALL BRIDES

If it were not for the wheel Washington would be deadly dull for that part of society which, for one reason or another prefers to spend the autumn here. A stroll hrough the West End not only shows that three-fourths of the fashionables have not urned their faces this way yet, but also ter simply live on the wheel and wonder, in the name of all that is useful, how they ever managed to get along without some such diversion all their lives. Some society youngsters who were so bruised and battered after a half dozen tumbles that they began to think learning to ride was not such tremendous fun after all, were inspired with renewed courage the other day, when Mrs. Stewart announced her determination to take up riding again. Mrs. Stewart has suffered greatly from several accidents, but they have not dimin-ished her courage and the lesson has not been lost on more timid young people of her acquaintance. Mrs. Carlisle, wife of the Secretary of the Treasury, began, a few days ago, to learn to ride, and while her first lesson and first fall were almost simultaneous events, she is persevering and is determined to conquer the silent steed in just as short a time as possible. Her instructors say she is an apt pupil. Socially nothing is happening nor will till the latter part of the month, when some festivities surrounding several weddings are expected to occur. The single exception in a home entertainment was the tea on Thursday afternoon at Mrs. Logan's home, Calumet Place. It brought together the present social strength of the capital. Gen. Miles, who is the lien of the moment, certainly can find no fault with the success of his first social appearance, nor can any one else. Mrs. Logan's parties are eminently sociable gatherings, and this was particularly so, only tinged by the regret that her lovely home is about to be closed for six months, while she travels for that length of time in southern Europe. of the Secretary of the Treasury, began, a

Mrs. Cleveland and her baby girls are going to enjoy another country outing, as after the return of the presidential party from Atlanta the White House family will go out to Woodley and remain there until Congress meets. The country around the suburban home of the President is robed in glowing colors just at present, and Mrs. Cleveland has such a fondness for the place that she much prefers it to living in town. The children spent nearly all the hours of sunshine in the White House grounds since they came back, and with the strangers they met were most friendly and chatty. Ruth and Baby Marian look like their mother, and Esther, who has gone into history as the White House baby, resembles the Cleveland side of the family. She has so many of the President's ways and little tricks of manner, and is so energetic and anxious to wait on everybody, that the President calls her his little "working woman." Both the girls make great progress with German, and are able to repeat many songs and verses and scriptural passages. They are sturdy, strong children, and are more plainly dressed, possibly, than any other two girls in the neighborhood of the Executive Mansion.

Excepting some informal visiting and an occasional guest at luncheon and dinner

Excepting some informal visiting and an occasional guest at luncheon and dinner, Mrs. Cleveland, like many less distinguished hostesses, will enjoy the quiet and Mrs. Cleveland, like many less distinguished hostesses, will enjoy the quiet and calm of the autumnal season, and will make no effort to show herself to the gay world of society or officialdom till the real winter sets in. It is a very pretty sight, and an illustration of womanly as well as republican simplicity, to see Mrs. Cleveland driving around these fine days in a phaeton, with Baby Marián cuddled up in her arms, and unattended by either nurses or servants, except the coachman. The day when Presidents and wives drove out behind four horses in full state and panoply has passed. President and Mrs. Cleveland use the phaeton more frequently than any other carriage in their stable, and very seldom have even a footman with them. The good people of Atlanta will regret that Mrs. Cleveland will not be with the President next week at the exposition, but the

The two new families in the cabinet circle will start a fresh spell of activity in that direction. It would be hard to find a lady better fitted to adorn her position than Mrs. Harmon, wife of the Attorney General. The Harmons have taken a delightfully situated house on K street, owned, but Lever occupied, by Mrs. Fred May of California. It is well furnished and has a sunny outlook over Franklin Park. Mrs. Harmon is not overfond of drawing room effects, and when a visitor drops in the hostess leads the way to the little library adjoining, where, both in the cavernous depths of big arm chairs, drawn up near the log fire on the hearth, conversation is likely to take on a friendliness, which Mrs. Harmon thinks would hardly be possible in an empire drawing room. The two new families in the cabinet circle an empire drawing room. Her acquaintances here a few weeks ago Her acquaintances here a few weeks ago were very limited, but that will not last long. She had not met Mrs. Cleveland until this week, and has yet met but a few of the cabinet ladies, owing to the long distances separating them since the appointment of the Attorney General. The Harmon family circle includes three daughters. The aldest who is only twenty tree. Harmon family circle includes three daughters. The eldest, who is only twenty-two, is the wife of Mr. Edmund Wright of Philadelphia, and will be here for a visit the coming winter. She is the proud mother of the only boy in the family, the Attorney General's first grandson, who is now about seven months old. Miss Harmon, who is a seven months old. Miss Harmon, who is a very prepossessing young lady, is almost a debutante, as last winter she went out to parties for the first time in Cincinnati. Miss Margery Harmon, the youngest member of the family, is in school here.

The family will undoubtedly entertain throughout the winter considerably. If there is one structure which Mrs. Harmon likes better than another in this city it is the Weshington manufacture. the Washington monument. She says it fascinates her completely, and she has made it a study while taking her afternoon drives to look out for points where it was not possible to get a glimpse of it. So far she has not found many.

Mrs. Wilson, wife of the Postmaster General, has lived in Washington during her husband's congressional terms, but she is husband's congressional terms, but she is almost a stranger to the great body of rociety folks. Her health has never been vigorous enough to permit her to do much outside of her own household, even if her tastes had not been that way. She does not care for the gay doings of the great world, as she is devoted to reading and domestic life. The Postmaster General bought a house or Q street last summer, and Mrs. Wilson, since her return from their summer home at Charlestown, has been occupied with getting it in order for occupancy. Miss Wilson will be an invaluable assistant to her mother, and will virtually take her place. Both ladies, it is expected, will accompany the presidential party down to Atlanta next week.

Monday, and may remain another week, for there are few people who come to this city who have her enthusiastic admiration for it She loves to mark its progress not only in the extension of its suburbs, but also in the constantly improving character of every section. While here primarily for business, her recreation consists in the long drives that have been so pleasant the past week. Mrs. Stanford, in her ability to conduct so satisfactorily not only this suit, but also the management of a vast fortune, makes a splendid example of a wife who was not only thoroughly conversant with her husband's effairs in almost every detail, but also of one who so absolutely shared his confidence that the act of either meant their joint opinion. With the gigantic operations in railroading, and, indeed, everything with which the Stanford name was connected, Mrs. Stanford was so familiar with the smallest detail that hundreds of times since the death of her husband she has been able to give at once his reasons and opinions on any point. This confidence which was reposed in her so naturally has been of immense benefit, since the entire burden has rested on her own shoulders. Her personal sacrifices she counts as nothing, if she will be able soon to see the end of the litigation.

Should the Supreme Court decision be unfavorable she will be obliged to close the possible exception of crowned heads there probably never was a couple who received more presents. All the trophies, cups, &c., won by the Stanford stables and the hundreds of gifts exchanged by Mr. and Mrs. Stanford in their long married life make other additions of wonderfully rare and beautiful things, so that the museum is already richer in this one respect alone than those founded for hundreds of years. Some of the most interesting of California mission relics have also been presented to Mrs. Stanford and enrich this collection.

The fall weddings or early winter ones,

The fall weddings, or early winter ones The fall weddings, or early winter ones, for that matter, are not especially notable, in number at least, and what will take place seem likely to be rather quietly arranged. From an international standpoint the bells will ring out first the marriage of Miss Jeannette Payson, daughter of Chas. Payson, and Mr. Raymond Le Ghait, son of the Belgian minister, who has spent several years here with his father, and is considered very good-looking and decidedly of the Belgian minister, who has spent several years here with his father, and is considered very good-looking and decidedly agreeable. Miss Payson has lived most of her life abroad, and will accompany her husband to foreign parts shortly after their marriage. The Payson family is going abroad also. The wedding day is set for October 28, and will take place at the Payson residence. Two or three other nuptial events for which the capital supplies then will be those of the Marquis de Chambrun and Miss Nichols, daughter of Mrs. Bellamy Storer of Cincunatl, where the event will occur, and Mr. George Fraser and Miss Tutt of St. Louis, who are, however, coming here to live, and whose wedding day is set for December 5, and one or two foreign matches, all arranged by the high principals, but only biding the time to overcome some parental objections, which now form insurmountable obstacles. The wheel is responsible for more revolutions than the tire makes. A chaperon which now form insurmountable obstacles. The wheel is responsible for more revolutions than the tire makes. A chaperon seems to be one of the hitherto necessities of fashionable life who can be dispensed with and Dame Grundy still kept pacified. A young lady and a man can go for a ride on their wheels unaccompanied, but if the same young people were seen driving together without a third person it would be considered either a formal announcement of their engagement or frightful ignorance of what is considered good form. And yet every one knows that the opportunities for long rests and flirtations, if such romantic pastimes are still current diversions, are more numerous wheeling than ever would be possible riding or driving. No use saying that chaperons can't ride. Why, the schools are full of gray-haired pupils, who learn as quickly as children. But with a Supreme Court justice pedaling in one direction and a cabinet lady learning to do the same, the pace is too rapid to bother any longer with wornout ideas, and it is likely the chaperon and her duties will soon be lost arts.

Should the Supreme Court decision be unfavorable she will be obliged to close the Stanford University and will never live in its vicinity again, as the destruction of that monument to son and husband would be more than she could witness. Notwith-standing all the worries, she feels recompensed in the knowledge that if all goes well ultimately, what has been done toward the establishment of the university is op sure lines and exactly as its founder would have wished. She is so absolutely absorbed in this great benefaction to the vouth of California that it has made her scrupulous of the loss of every day or hour not spent in something to forward its progress. During the past summer she has arranged with her own hands the Stanford memorial room in the museum of the university.
